

The Storm from the East

Whispers Across the Desert

Two years after the Breaking of the Echo, strange reports began filtering in from the eastern borders of Miraleth. Merchant caravans spoke of vast dust clouds on the horizon, moving against the wind.

Desert nomads fled westward, carrying tales of a great army that stretched from horizon to horizon, led by warriors in golden armor who rode beasts that breathed fire.

Khalid ibn Rashad, the current Prince of Miraleth, dismissed these reports as desert fantasies until his own border scouts failed to return.

When he sent a full reconnaissance company eastward, only one man staggered back, half-dead from thirst and terror.

"An empire," the scout gasped before collapsing.
"Larger than all five cities combined.
They call it... Solath-Mor... the Golden Dominion.
They're coming."

Far to the east, beyond the great desert and over the Spine of the World mountains, lay the vast empire of Solath-Mor. For a thousand years, this mighty realm had grown in power and ambition, ruled by the ancient Dynasty of the Solar Throne.

Their capital city of Aurum Imperius made even Thalarion look like a village, with golden spires that touched the clouds and armies numbering in the millions.

